To the Editor, The Wall Street Journal

Qwest Chairman Notebaert (Feb. 28) argues that concerns about concentration in the large business market suggest that Qwest, not Verizon, should team up with MCI. He conveniently ignores the fact that the Qwest-MCI combination would eliminate a critical network for large business and government customers, thereby eliminating a competitive facility and reducing choice. Instead of eliminating a network, Verizon has committed to major investment to improve that network.

In talking to Wall Street, Mr. Notebaert candidly admits he plans to reduce choices by not only consolidating traffic on one network but also by eliminating duplicative POPs or access points where customers can connect to nationwide networks. This is how Qwest hopes to achieve huge synergies and cut 15,000 jobs.

In short, a Verizon-MCI transaction brings together complementary assets. A Qwest-MCI transaction is designed to eliminate duplicative assets.

Today AT&T dominates the business market place. Either alone or with SBC, it will continue as the dominant player. If partnered with a financially strong company like Verizon, MCI will be an attractive alternative for customers.

Verizon-MCI offers the best alternative for customers because no competitive facilities are eliminated, and the financial health of the new company would assure a strong competitor would remain to the dominant player in the business market place.
